(Continued)

The Ultram and Ambien pills resemble one another. On the morning of Farmer's accident, his wife laid out his Ultram (and Soma) and Ambien on their microwave, but she separated the pills so that the appellant would take the Ambien at night because "both his doctor and his pharmacist recommended that he be within minutes of going to bed before taking Ambien." Following Farmer's arrest for DWI, Ambien was found in his bloodstream, and his wife testified that the Ambien she laid out for him in the morning was gone. Farmer appealed his conviction for DWI to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals on the grounds that his conviction was based on an involuntary act because he did not recall taking the Ambien and did not intentionally take the Ambien.

Would you convict Farmer of DWI? See Farmer v. State, 411 S.W.3d 901 (Tex. Ct. of Crim. App. 2013).

You can find the answer at study.sagepub.com/lippmaness2e